Inspired by Texas Communities & Hidden Histories

Much of Ruby's work is deeply inspired by the landscapes, histories, and people of small-town Texas. From quiet downtown streets and historic newspapers to fading storefronts, ranch roads, family-owned cafés, and generations of untold stories, her novels are rooted in the emotional atmosphere of communities that still carry their past with them.

Close-knit Texas communities—such as Honey Grove, Port Isabel, Abilene, and Buffalo Gap—have helped shape the emotional foundation behind several upcoming works, including Suzanne's Locket, The Lighthouse Letters, and The Procession. Through historical research, local inspiration, and a love for preserving the spirit of small-town life, Ruby creates fictional stories from communities that are lived in, layered, and authentic.

Her longtime ties to Abilene, Texas, through her husband's heritage, and love of West Texas culture have also influenced the settings and emotional tone of many of her stories, including ranch country mysteries, emotionally driven family dramas, and atmospheric suspense novels. While her stories are fictional, they are often built from the emotional truth of real places and the people who live there.
